The Landscaping Pay-Off

A consumer landscaping research study by Michigan State University was done to identify how much value a good landscape adds to a home from the consumer's perspective, to identify the aspects of a landscape that homeowners value and to see how that value varies across several markets. There were three factors used to define each landscape — plant size, design sophistication and plant material — and the effect these factors had on the value consumers assigned to the property. While the findings varied by region, a constant was that larger plants made consumers assign higher home values and interesting plant material had less effect than design sophistication or plant size. The most preferred in all states was a sophisticated design with large deciduous, evergreens, and annual color plants and colored hardscape. A "good" landscape could add anywhere from 6 to 12 percent to the base value of the home.

For more information on this survey, check out the May 2007 article "The Landscape-Enhanced Home" or visit www.lgrmag.com and search our archives for related information.

In a recent research study, a sophisticated design with large deciduous, evergreen, and annual color plants was found to be the most desired landscaping style.

Fashionable Fashion Displays

It can be challenging to make gardening clothes appear fashionable, yet Joseph Weishar has some ideas to help the garden center address this dilemma. Mundane, practical pieces of clothing and accessories should be presented as items with integrity and image. Exhibit a consistency of product, accessories and ambience, making a statement that is intriguing to view and gives customers a trust in the professionalism of the products and retailer.

While this display is intended to sell tiles, the message is applicable for the garden industry as well: An engaging display is infinitely better than a dull one.

The self-image of the users is of the utmost importance and if, when making a purchase, they know that the item has been given care and thought, it will be more valued. Putting together an atmosphere conducive to and congratulatory for the level of personal appeal is the main responsibility that retailers have toward their consumers.
